“ Please, plseae, plseae bring this back. This was the only reason I would get up so early and get a great start to my day. This helped me cope when my children were babies and had colic. Experienced many hours of crying children and this gave a me a peaceful mind. I agree with the others, if you can't bring back plseae put on dvd.Please! <http://wqxyhyfq.com> [url=<http://qlwzob.com>]qlwzob[/url] [link=<http://budbomcqrnz.com>]budbomcqrnz[/link]

“ I am a new sub and experiencing sub drop for the first time. It is tifyerring and I feel your dom SHOULD be there whether they are permanent or a temp because I agree that part of the play is the care the sub will and should receive afterwards. The sub just did their part in the agreements, making themselves vulnerable to another human being and the LEAST a dom could do is be there for the emotional aftermath they created. I am lucky that my dom is my teacher, my mentor and my guide through my first dom/sub relationship and is walking me through everything and asking how I feel. When I mentioned this morning about my fears, insecurity, exhaustion, feeling on the verge of crying, shame, he was there to comfort me and even made me laugh. I still feel down which is to be excepted but I know I would be worse if he wasn't here to guide me. It would be nicer if he could physically be here but unfortunately he can't and he is doing what he can to help. That is what I feel a dom should be like and what I have come to understand what a dom is suppose to do from what I have read about dom/sub relationship. It is not hard for the temp dom to offer their number to the sub incase they need to talk to them to get through the sub drop. I do not think there isn't any excuses for abandoning someone who put themselves in such a position when a dom knows the risk of a sub drop after play. Ya, I am being a bit rough but I am kind of a dom too and in a sub drop so my emotions are raw submitting doesn't come easy to everyone, don't take advantage of it.
